Research on the consequences of collective action is a flourishing subfield in Political Sciences and Sociology. Over the years, scholars have investigated collective action's internal and external impacts in organizational, political, cultural, biographical, economic, and legal realms. However, fewer contributions have explicitly considered the connection between the outcomes of collective mobilization and their relational dimensions. The conference aims to fill this gap by shedding light on the relational consequences of collective action at the micro, meso, and macro levels. It focuses on how the interactions within and between activists, challengers, targets, and audiences influence biographical, political, cultural, and social change processes. Furthermore, it asks to what extent relationships can be intended as outcomes of collective action per se and what methodologies are better suited to grasp them.
