Art. 2

Educational objectives

The "Colonial Studies" Spring School at SNS has the aim of addressing new perspectives on colonial studies focusing in its first edition on Indigeneity and Colonisation. In the first part of the course, participants will explore the poetics and ethics of the historical narrative pertaining to Settler-colonialism. In the second part, we explore the history and present of Settler-colonisation, and the manner in which Colonialism was and continues to be ordained through Capitalism. We pause at polychronic conjunctures in history to analyse the interconnectedness of Colonial studies to Feminism, for example, as a method to understanding structures of power and domination manifested in oppression, supremacy and privilege. In the third part of the course, we explore possibilities of decolonization emerging from the South. We look at collective action and agency in the struggle against colonisation. Here we study social and political anti-colonial movements. We also explore novel research on solidarity movements, and the instrumentalization of epistemic methods of oppression to suppress international solidarity against forms of colonization. Finally, we will elaborate on the epistemic structures of knowledge production on Colonization while also discussing the pitfalls and crises of colonial studies in living up to contemporary challenges.

In a continuously changing world, colonization changes forms and colors. We will discuss in this course American Imperialism in the context of subjugating Iraq and Venezuela and, potentially, Greenland to violence, war and exploitation.
